DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (if known) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE
At the head of the northeast branch of Fishing Creek stands a low, one and one-half story frame dwelling on a tract called Jones Regulation. North of the house is the Jones burying ground, which is maintained by the Jones family. The house is a long structure built on brick piers. It is divided into two portions, the taller possibly older than the shorter portion. Its walls are covered with asbestos siding. Early paneled shutters exist on the north facade windows. There are three chimneys spaced almost equally at the ends and middle of the house. On the south side, extending from the window of the taller portion over the entire length of the shorter portion is a leanto, partially porch, partially enclosed. Inside, the floor plan is almost identical to Rubye Brooks house in Woolford. It consists of two rooms in both portions, plus the leanto. In the early part, the walls are sheathed with vertical beaded boards and the partition is a single board thick. The present owners say that the joists were originally exposed before the installation of a plaster ceiling. An enclosed stair is located in the corner of both rooms, both having paneled doors and being very narrow. The moldings appear similar to those at the Rubye Brooks house. The second floor rooms are sheathed with boards throughout. No plaster is used. Apparently, there is a back to back fireplace in the center of the house, although neither are open. The room between the kitchen and the older part have one wall of vertical board and an enclosed stair adjacent the kitchen wall. The kitchen itself retains little of antiquity, having been remodeled extensively. Judging from the molding and door between the old portion and the leanto, the latter has been on the house since the early 19th century, probably soon after the wing was built.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

The house is very important as a survival of vernacular architecture which has undergone little change and which originally has a good deal of detail to begin with. The present owner plans some refurbishing in the immediate future.
